Five children entered the home during the month of October, three native Hawaiians, two of whom are girls aged ten and twelve years, and one boy eight years old. Their father and mother are dead. Two French Porto Rican girls, ages three and seven years, whose parents had deserted them.

Teachers and children join me in thanks to all the above named people. There are fifty-six children here. We need a shed for the children to play under when it rains. We need a laundry, we need bath rooms at the boys' building and we need a school house. I asked the Board of Education to build a schoolhouse and supply teachers, but it will be two years before they have any money which they could use for that purpose. Two of the buildings need to be painted. We need another tank to insure sufficient water for the dry season.

A good many people are inquiring what we would like for Xmas presents. We need money more than anything. We would be very thankful for clothing, especially strong new clothing, not too light in color. Dry goods and groceries are always useful. The children would enjoy apples and nuts, and books for their library, pictures for the walls and some of Miller's candy. We have plenty of toys and dolls that came last Xmas.

Money for the Orphanage may be deposited at the banking house of Bishop & Co.

ENCOURAGEMENT FOR THE MAN OF FORTY-FIVE

In the legal profession Judge John A. Blevins does not see a great deal of hope for the man who enters it after he has passed the age of 40, though he agrees that its door is always open to men at all stages of life, and a man might attain success though he were 50 when he entered it, providing he had the ability necessary for advancement. His position can not be clearly understood, however, until after his words have been read in full.

"A man may begin the practice of law at any age, say 45, and build up a large practice before he retires on account of old age or other infirmities. It is possible, but not probable, for no man can secure a practice before he is prepared for it, and this means years of study even after he is admitted to the bar. When a law student is granted the privilege of practicing in the courts he may think he knows it all, but will soon find he is mistaken. If he is admitted to the bar at 21 he will hardly find himself competent to practice before he is 30, and it may be ten or twenty years after that before he finds himself on a self-sustaining basis. The young man, therefore, has but little ground for hope of much success before he is 40, at the earliest, and as the older man must necessarily go through the same period of trials and tribulations, I do not see what chance there is for him. If he is 45 when he enters the legal profession he would probably be 65 before he had enough cases to pay for his board and lodging and office rent. As you suggest, however, it sometimes depends very largely on the man. He might, by lucky chance, secure a good case that would win for him some reputation immediately after he was admitted to the bar, and this would bring others, but if he did not have the substantial foundation that only years, long years, of study can give, it is hardly probable that he would be able to hold it. As I said before, a man may enter upon the practice of law at 45, 55, or 65, but he would be better off if he applied himself to something else that required a less extensive preparation. When a man has failed of success before he is 45 what he wants after that to win is an occupation in which returns are quick and the amount of preparation necessary the very minimum. Before 45 a man can play a waiting game; he is still in a position to hope for rewards in the future. After that age it is the present that counts; he can no longer wait, but must strike at the iron of opportunity while it is still red-hot, for it grows cold rapidly after a man has passed 50."

The same argument about a long preparation being necessary for success is found in the banking world, though the "door of hope" is not closed to the man of mature years, according to Mr. Walker Hill, president of the American Exchange bank.

"To succeed, that is, to have every assurance of success, providing one has ability," says Mr. Hill, "a man ought to enter a bank before he is 30. In other branches of business a comparatively brief period of preparation will fit a man for somewhat responsible positions, but a knowledge of the banking business, that knowledge which the high officials find necessary, must be acquired from the ground up. It can not be gained in theory, not by burning the midnight oil over treatises on the proper conduct of a bank and its different departments, but in actual practice in its daily work. I don't suppose there would be any objection to the employment in a bank of an inexperienced man of 45, if his character was all right, but he would have to begin at the bottom, and the fewer years of life before him would necessarily reduce his hope of attaining a high position. Promotion in a bank, in this bank especially, is won entirely by merit, and the older man would have an equal chance with his younger brother in this respect, but promotion in a financial institution is also slow, so that at 65, just when advancing years would compel him to give up active work, he would find himself no farther advanced than the younger man would be at 40. of experience, so long as they are able to attend properly to their duties, to attend to them in an expeditious and thorough manner, maturer years cut no figure whatsoever. A man of 60 is apt to be just as valuable as a man of 40, perhaps even a little more so. To the employment of men of maturer years who have had previous experience in banking we could not, of course, have any objection whatever. In the business world in general, however, I think a man of 45 has just as good a chance of getting work and of succeeding as a younger man. If a man is strong and well, I do not believe that mature years would ever be urged as an objection against his employment either in this city or anywhere else."

Scott's Emulsion, then the strength of good health, then the bright developing mind—that is often the progress of a weak child.

Little daily doses of Scott's Emulsion give strength to weak children and fatten the thin ones.

It is peculiarly adapted for children's needs.
